

He stood the matter last that's no matter
 He gammon'd the twelve ^{and he} ~~from~~ within the warden
 Will. A pardon he got from his gracious ~~lord~~ King
 When ~~the~~ amazing Jack he was just the thing.

 With Blue ~~Cockade~~ Cockade proclaimed for war
 With blud'ger stout or tom bar*
 No hero a male he never would fail
 Got getting a Map House or Bussing a Gave
 Was a victim he fell to his country's laws
 And died at last in religious cause
 No Nelson made the Habs do swing
 And when tuck'd up he was, just the thing.

just the thing, just the thing
 and when tuck'd up he was just the thing.

This song was made after the execution of the British in 1780. and was sung about the streets with great applause.

* Gangs of Musicians with tom bars in their hands went from house to house demanding money, and no one ventured to refuse giving.

A Quince is a Green I were loth
 A Quince is a Green that I best you sh and Bown
 With any Get gone in Heaven Bawl away Bawl away

Bawl away.

This was the title (I believe) of a song which I remember was sung by ~~two~~ two women at the end of Swan Yard opposite Sorrow House in the Strand, my evening. They had two or three others also which were sung in rotation. There was always a considerable crowd of fools idlers, and pick-pockets. ^{they were many such} There were many such groups in different parts of London and in proportion to the volume of the song and the flash manner of singing, ^{than} was the applause the singers received.

I can recollect only a line or two

My smack's above my knee she did say, she did say
 My smack's above my knee she did say.
 My smack's above my knee, and you may plainly see
 You may have a smack at me, Bawl away, Bawl away

Another begins thus.

Come Bawl away it's just four o'clock
 It's time to repair to the Dog and Duck
 And if with a call you should see so mut
 Bawl him round to Catherine Street
 Not de riddle let. Mi let ra.
 Mi let, idler idler, si let, ra.

Another The Girls of Three Blue

I cannot remember more than a line but it equalled in infamy either of the other.
